II. 翻譯 參考答案

Most of the time, the future is just a replica of the past. Although changes may appear on the surface, true transformation rarely occurs. It all depends on whether you can fully feel the present moment, relying on its power to resolve the past. How your future will be is determined by your current state of consciousness. If your mind is burdened by the weight of the past, then your experience of the future will be the same.

On one hand, we often place our thoughts on the future, investing a lot of mental energy and effort in imagining what lies ahead. There are always many worries about the unknown future. On the other hand, we sometimes fondly reminisce about the past, recalling some unpleasant events. Doing so indirectly demonstrates that we have never truly created the so-called “now” or “present moment. If we have never properly immersed ourselves in experiencing the present, we will continuously create a life we don’t want.
